ABSTRACT

This report provides an overview of research designed to dispel myths about performance in high poverty and high minority schools. It identifies schools that have had high performance on a particular state assessment for at least 2 years in a row. The results are based on an analysis of high performance over multiple years in any of six possible subject areas, depending on which are tested in each state (reading, language arts, math, science, social studies, and writing). Results find that: 2,770 high poverty and high minority schools have had high performance in at least one particular grade level and subject area over multiple years; 904 schools have had high performance at more than one grade level over multiple years; 1,287 have had high performance in more than one subject area over multiple years; and 721 have had high performance at more than one grade level and in more than one subject over multiple years. Out of the 2,770 schools, 135 were magnet schools, and 17 were charter schools. Data on school contact information, school characteristics, and school achievement (grades and subjects with high performance over multiple years) are appended. (SM)

Dispelling the Myth . . . Over Time

Are there high-poverty and high-minority schools that have sustained high performance over multiple years?

This bulletin seeks to answer that question by providing an overview of our latest "Dispelling the Myth" research. Using the powerful and far-reaching database that fuels Dispelling the Myth Online, the Education Trust continues to identify and explore schools that, in various ways, dispel the destructive myth that race and poverty are insurmountable barriers to high achievement. Earlier, we used the most current year's data to identify schools that serve large concentrations of low-income students and/or students of color, and still performed in the top third among schools in their respective states. In this multi-layered analysis, we identify high-poverty and high-minority schools that exhibit sustained high performance on one or more assessments for at least two years, including schools that have done so in multiple subject areas and grade levels.

Digging Deeper into Dispelling the Myth Online

In December 2001, the Education Trust made available to the public findings from a preliminary analysis of its new interactive database, Dispelling the Myth Online, in a report entitled Dispelling the Myth Revisited (DTMR). A follow-up report published on our Web site in April (Additional Tables) provided additional information about the schools identified in the December report. We promised on both occasions to continue to describe the results of newer analyses as we took advantage of improvements in this powerful new database. Click on the links or visit our Dispelling the Myth Web page, available at www.edtrust.org, to view those earlier reports.

The initial data work for this study was conducted by specialists at the American Institutes for Research under contract to the Education Trust. The Education Trust conducted additional analyses based on AIR's results.

How is the new analysis similar to the one described in December's Dispelling the Myth Revisited report?

This new analysis uses the same operational definitions for "high-poverty," "high-minority," and "high-performing" that the Education Trust used for the analysis described in DTMR.

- "High performing": Performance on one or more state assessments (e.g., fourth grade math) among the top third of all schools in a state that took a particular test at the same grade level.
- "High poverty": The school's percentage of students who qualify for the federal free or reduced-price lunch program is at least 50% AND ranks in the top third for poverty enrollment among schools in the state at the same grade-level.
- "High minority": The school's percentage of African-American and Latino students is at least 50% AND ranks in the top third for African-American and Latino enrollment among schools in the state at the same grade-level.

How is the new analysis different from the one described in December's Dispelling the Myth Revisited report?

First, and most important, this analysis only identifies schools that have had high performance on a particular state assessment (e.g., 4th grade math) for at least two years in a row. The analysis is based on the most recent annual test results.

Second, newer 2001 assessment results have been added to the database for nearly a dozen states since we conducted the preliminary analysis last fall. We will update this multi-year analysis when the fully updated database is released later this summer.

Third, while our preliminary analysis for DTMR examined only math and reading (or language arts), this analysis takes advantage of the full set of assessment results in the database. Therefore, the results are based on an analysis of high performance over multiple years in any of six possible subject areas, depending on which are tested in each state: reading, language arts, math, science, social studies, and writing.

The Results

1. How many high poverty and/or high minority schools had high performance in at least one particular grade level and subject area over multiple years?

2,770

Note that this number reflects only schools that had high scores in the same grade level and subject area over multiple years – for example 4th grade math. It excludes schools that might have had high performance in 4th grade math one year and in 5th grade math the next year, or in 7th grade reading one year and 6th grade science the next. Also, this number does not include schools in states that issue only "total" test scores rather than scores in any of the six individual subjects listed above; therefore, it does not include schools from West Virginia and South Dakota.

2. How many high poverty and/or high minority schools had high performance at more than one grade level over multiple years?

904

Again, note that many states do not test students in more than one grade level per school, so those schools cannot be analyzed to determine whether they would meet such criteria.

3. How many high poverty and/or high minority schools had high performance in more than one subject area over multiple years?

1,287

Again, note that this only includes schools that had high performance for two years in a row in at least two subjects. Schools with high performance for two or more years in a row in third grade reading, fourth grade reading, and fifth grade reading are not counted, although such schools can be found in the database.

4. How many high poverty and/or high minority schools had high performance at more than one grade level and in more than one subject over multiple years?

Again, keep in mind that this is a more restrictive set of criteria than might be necessary for some purposes. The number only includes schools that had high performance for two years in a row in two particular subject areas and grade levels. The database also includes schools that had high performance in multiple years across different grade-subject configurations – for example, fourth grade math and fifth grade math in one year and fourth grade math and fifth grade science in the next, or fourth grade math and fifth grade science one year and fourth grade science and fifth grade math the next.

5. How many high poverty and/or high minority schools that have had high test scores over multiple years report being magnet and/or charter schools?

Out of the 2,770 schools in the database that meet the criteria described above for high performance in multiple years, there are

- 135 schools that reported being magnet schools in a federal survey or that had the word "magnet" in their titles;
- 1,352 schools that reported not being magnet schools in a federal survey and that did not have "magnet" in their titles;
- 1,283 schools that did not provide information on whether the school was a magnet school and did not have the word "magnet" in their titles;
- 17 schools that reported being charter schools in a federal survey or that had the word "charter" in their titles;
- 2,326 schools that reported not being charter schools in a federal survey and that did not have "charter" in their titles; and
- 427 schools that did not provide information on whether the school was a charter school (or that are in states not permitting charter schools) and did not have the word "charter" in their titles.

A Final Note

Our Dispelling the Myth project is about learning how to help poor and minority children achieve at higher levels by studying schools where such students perform better on state assessments. No single definition of "success" or "high performance" can suffice for such a task, and to suggest otherwise is overly simplistic. Readers should not assume that all schools that have high performance, even over multiple years in multiple subjects and grade levels, are perfect schools, and they should take care to collect additional information on them before making the assumption that their practices are worthy of emulation.

Similarly, readers should avoid the assumption that we have nothing to learn from schools that do not meet the most exclusive, multiple, and overlapping criteria possible in a database analysis such as this. Some schools that do not have high performance in every grade level or every subject area tested might still have much to teach us about better educating poor and minority children. Again, this project is not about a search for "perfect schools," but rather about a search for schools that can teach lessons about improving results elsewhere.

For example, Mount Royal Elementary/Middle School, with 99% African American students and over 80% poor students, so far has had high test scores over multiple years only in fifth grade, yet its 5th grade math scores have been among the very highest in the entire state of Maryland for three years in a row. Mount Royal proves that although each 5th grade class is a different group of "apples" or "oranges," excellent instruction can consistently turn them into top performers. Mount Royal's success was recently profiled in a Washington Post column by Karin Chenoweth (Karin Chenoweth, "In a Place of Bleak Prospects, Teacher Elicits Big Achievements," Thursday, April 25, 2002).

Similarly, Lincoln Elementary wouldn't qualify as having high scores in multiple subject areas over more than one year, yet it and the school district it's in (Mount Vernon, NY) have received praise for raising the performance of minority students and substantially narrowing achievement gaps. Lincoln Elementary was recently profiled in a New York Times piece on Mount Vernon's impressive accomplishments (Lisa W. Foderaro, "Using Love, and Chess Lessons, to Defy Theories on Race and Test Scores," Sunday, April 7, 2002).

School Achievement: Grades and Subjects with High Performance Over Multiple Years

* In addition, while the preliminary analysis analyzed all varieties of test scores in each state, this study looked only at one kind of test score for each subject area and grade level tested. For example, if a state published a "scale score," a "percentile rank" score, and a "percent proficient" score for fourth graders in math, we analyzed only the first of these. Average scores on criterion-referenced exams took precedence. Thus, for example, in Kentucky we evaluated elementary schools based on their performance on the CATS test, but did not consider "percentile rank" scores from the CTBS test. Readers who wish to search for schools that have performed at high levels over multiple years on different assessment scores than those used for this analysis can do so by visiting our Dispelling the Myth Online interactive Web page.

DISPELLING THE MYTH . . . OVER TIME:: Grade/Subjects With Sustained "Top Third" Achievement (Statewide) For At Least Two Years In A Row

This analysis only identifies schools that have had high performance on a particular state assessment (e.g., 4th grade math) for at least two years in a row. The analysis is based on the most recent annual test results available in the database for each state. (For most states, that means 2000, but for nearly a dozen states, the database has been updated to include 2001 scores. The fully updated database will be released this summer.)

The results consist of six possible subject areas, depending on which are tested in each state: reading, language arts, math, science, social studies, and writing. All of the schools on this list scored in the top third of all schools in their states on the state's test for the particular subject and grade noted for at least two years in a row.  Please see page 4 of the report for more detailed information on the test data used.*

SUBJECT AREA KEY: This analysis looked at scores in the following subject areas: reading (R); language arts (L); math (M); science (S); social studies (H); and writing (W). Some states report school-wide scores for each subject area tested instead of breaking out the scores by grade level. Schools that qualify for the list based on such scores received a qualified '(YES)' in the "Mult. Grades" column.
